Opening 1 / 7

Hi, everyone. I'm Jasper, Collin's younger brother. I'm the one who got the bottom bunk, and I'd like everyone to understand what that means. It means I spent ten years looking up at the underside of my brother's mattress.

Part 2 2 / 7

Collin had rules for the bunk bed. Rule one: the ladder is his. Rule two: if I wanted to talk after lights out, I had to tap the wall three times, and he would tap back twice if he was awake. If he tapped once, that meant go to sleep.

Part 3 3 / 7

I tapped three times on a lot of nights. I was scared of thunder, and then I was scared about a test, and then I was scared about a girl in my class. Every single time, he tapped back twice. He never once tapped one.

Part 4 4 / 7

Yolanda, I want you to know the code. Three taps means, are you awake. Two taps means, yes, tell me. It is the most reliable system our family has ever had, and it has never needed a battery.

Part 5 5 / 7

I moved out eight years ago. Last week I stayed over at his place before the wedding, on the couch, and around midnight I heard three taps on the wall. I tapped back twice. Then I lay there grinning like a kid. He said through the wall, 'Nervous?' I said, 'Me? You're the groom.' He said, 'Yeah. A little.' We talked until two.

Part 6 6 / 7

Yolanda, from now on, when he taps three times, it's your turn. Answer twice. He will tell you what he's afraid of, and then he will make you laugh about it. That is the whole system. Welcome to the bottom bunk.

Closing 7 / 7

Collin, I never said thank you for the taps. Thank you. I love you, and I am very glad I got the bottom bunk. Everyone, please raise a glass to Collin and Yolanda: may the wall between you always be thin, and the answer always be two.
